Malthus (Rev. T. R.). Essay on the Principle of Population, &c. remarks on his attempt to account for the increase of population in America. statement of alterations and additions in this impression of his work. - restrictions on his arrangement of the inquiry into the natural rate of the increase of mankind, compared with that of the subsistence necessary for their support. - Mr. M.'s reply to the assertions of Mr. Gray and others, that he regards the vices and follies of human nature as benevolent remedies for correcting the disorders arising from a redundant population. - Mr. M.'s three axioms on population stated, - the practical conclusion resulting from them, - that redundancy of population is a greater evil than deficiency; and that bounties on population are not only unnecessary, but ultimately injurious, - the present situation of many once populous but now comparatively desert countries, no objection - nor is the pressure of population against supply in more civilized countries, - this proved from the present state of our peasantry, and also of manufacturing towns, - their present healthy state, effects of the comparative shortness of life on population, the case of agricultural countries, whence provisions are exported to supply the deficiency of other countries, no objection to Mr. Malthus's system, - this proved from the present state of Ireland, - and of Poland, - his system of moral restraint, - considerations on it, - the inefficiency of our Poor Laws.

(See also Bonar, "Malthus and his Work," 1885. pp. 304.)

Malthus (Rev. T. R.). Principle of stated, with respect to the different rates of increase of population, particularly in America. - Godwin's remarks therein, refuted. - Mr. Malthus's principle, that population tends to increase faster than the means of subsistence, corroborated; - his observations on the right of the poor to a maintenance, vindicated from the objections of Godwin.
